Bullion - COMEX Gold began the week on a strong note rising 2.44% to settle above $3,322 per ounce, while silver gained 0.67% supported by a weaker U.S. dollar and renewed safe-haven demand amid persistent U.S.-China trade tensions. Market sentiment turned cautious after President Trump stated he has no plans to meet with Chinese President Xi Jinping, further fueling geopolitical uncertainty. Additionally, Trump announced 100% tariffs on foreign-produced films and reiterated his call for the Fed to cut interest rates, though he confirmed Fed Chair Jerome Powell would remain in his role through May 2026. On the data front, the April ISM Services PMI exceeded expectations, rising to 51.6 from March's 50.8. Gold is currently trading above $3,340 as focus shifts to the Fed's upcoming policy meeting. While markets anticipate rates will remain unchanged, attention will be on Chair Powell's commentary for clues on future policy direction.

Crude Oil – WTI crude oil fell to a four-year low of $55.3 per barrel on Monday, extending last week's losses after OPEC+ agreed to increase collective production by an additional 411,000 barrels per day in June, accelerating the rollback of previous output cuts. Saudi Arabia has reportedly warned that it may implement further production increases, potentially restoring the remainder of the group's suspended 2.2 million bpd in similar increments unless underperforming members compensate for past overproduction with additional cuts. Although prices recovered to close above $57 per barrel yesterday and have edged up to $58.1 today, signs of weakness in the Chinese economy and growing global recession fears continue to dampen the demand outlook. Concerns over rising global supply may also limit any significant upside.

Natural Gas - NYMEX natural gas futures declined to $3.5/mmBtu yesterday, following a sharp rebound last week, as forecasts for moderate temperatures in the near term and declining LNG export flows, are weighing on demand prospects.

Base metals – Base metals extended their rally, with copper leading gains on COMEX for a third straight session, supported by a weaker dollar and hopes of progress on multiple trade fronts. Although the LME remained closed on Monday, bullish momentum persisted amid signs that the US and China may resume dialogue, even as President Trump confirmed no immediate plans to speak with his Chinese counterpart. Market sentiment was further buoyed by a robust US jobs report, easing fears of a trade induced slowdown. While ongoing US trade negotiations with several countries may help support prices, gains could be capped by weakness in China's services sector, as the PMI slipped to 50.7, its lowest level in seven months, highlighting economic pressure from U.S. tariffs.
