Bullion - Bullion plunged on Thursday, with Comex June gold closing down 1.41% and May silver dropping 7.73%. Gold fell to a one-week low, while silver hit a one-month low. The sharp decline followed reports that precious metals were excluded from former President Trump's "reciprocal" tariffs. COMEX gold inventories have surged in recent months amid concerns that tariffs could disrupt shipments. However, expectations of rate cuts, central bank purchases, and robust gold-backed ETF demand helped limit losses. Silver also suffered on fears that US tariffs could trigger a global trade war, impacting industrial metal demand. In economic data, US initial jobless claims fell by 6,000 to 219,000, signaling labor market strength, while continuing claims rose to a 3½-year high of 1.903 million. The March ISM Services Index declined to 50.8, a nine-month low. Today, gold is trading near $3,115 as markets await US Nonfarm Payrolls, expected at 135K, while Fed Chair Powell and other officials are set to speak later today.

Crude Oil – WTI crude oil plummeted by 6.4% on Thursday, marking its steepest decline since 2022, falling to $66 per barrel, following OPEC+'s announcement that it plans to increase oil production more than expected in May. The producer group will phase out output cuts by raising production by 411,000 barrels per day, significantly higher than the anticipated increase of just under 140,000 barrels per day. Oil prices were already under substantial pressure due to fears of a global trade war, as reciprocal tariffs from the Trump administration, prompted China and the EU both vowing retaliation, which weakened the global demand outlook. Today, oil prices continue to decline amid lingering concerns over tariffs and the demand outlook.

Natural Gas - Nymex Henry Hub natural gas futures rose by 2% yesterday, despite a third consecutive week of increasing stocks, as weather forecasts predicted colder temperatures in the north US.

Base metals – Base metals on the LME fell sharply on Thursday, led by copper, which sank over 3% to $9,366.50/tonne, its steepest drop in weeks. Aluminum and zinc also declined, as industrial metals were swept up in a broader market sell-off triggered by fears that aggressive new U.S. tariffs will stifle global growth and weaken demand. President Trump's announcement of sweeping reciprocal tariffs, including a 10% baseline import duty and steeper rates on key partners like China (54%) and the EU (20%) rattled sentiment. While metals like copper, aluminum, and steel were excluded for now, ongoing investigations and the potential for future action under Section 232 keep markets on edge. LME metals are likely to remain under pressure amid ongoing trade tensions and uncertainty over potential U.S. tariff actions for metals.
